{ House H is located in a typical suburban area in Madrid, where houses on individual plots are often too close to each other. In this situation the challenge was to combine certain degree of privacy with the desire of opening big windows and merging interior and exterior in a continuous light-filled space. A system of voids, deep windows and patios was developed in order to allow these large openings without neglecting the equally important need of privacy. The volume results from applying strictly local urban regulations: maximum occupation, perimeter definition, alignments, maximum height... and the following subtraction of the voids, porches and patios, in order to accomplish the floor area ratio. The result is a pure simple prism (20X9X9 meters) drilled by big hollow voids connected between them generating and organizing interior space. }
